

Abstract:

Steel is known to exhibit a complex material behavior, where the macroscopic properties are highly dependent on the underlying microstructure. In this talk, we present a microscale, sharp-interface model describing the bainitic phase transformation in steel. For a simplified model with given phase-interface movement, we then derive a homogenized, macroscopic model that still accounts for the microscopical structure.